Rube Goldberg (1883-1970) was the most famous cartoonist of his time, whose work was syndicated in daily newspapers throughout the world. He worked in just about every medium, starting out as a vaudeville entertainer, later hosting his own radio show and television program, creating his own animated cartoons, and writing screenplays, short stories, poems, and a novel. Known primarily for his cartoon inventions, Rube described his machines as a "symbol of man's capacity for exerting maximum effort to achieve minimal results," and believed most people went about things the hard way rather than using a more simple and direct path to accomplish their goals.
